Corinne provides counsel to corporate and individual clients regarding their intellectual property. Corinne focuses her practice on building, managing, and protecting domestic and foreign trademark portfolios and prides herself on providing practical and cost-effective advice. Corinne has in depth experience managing global trademark portfolios, including clearance, prosecution, and enforcement. She finds solutions for her clients' various trademark and copyright prosecution and enforcement needs, including domain and social media infringement issues; license, assignment, and settlement agreements; and other intellectual property transactional matters.

Corinne places great value and importance on being an active member of her community. She serves as a firm representative to the Philadelphia Bar Association's Large Firm Associates Committee. Corinne also maintains an active pro bono practice. She serves as a child advocate at the Support Center for Child Advocates, a nonprofit organization that represents abused and neglected children in Philadelphia. She is also a member of the National Association of Women Lawyers.

Corinne earned her bachelor's degree, with honors, in political science and international studies from the University of Michigan. She earned her law degree, magna cum laude, from Temple University. While in law school, Corinne served as a judicial intern in the First Judicial District Court in Philadelphia and the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. She also served as staff editor and articles editor for the Temple Law Review and teaching assistant for Legal Research & Writing.

Prior to attending law school, Corinne spent time as a corps member with Teach for America and taught special education and English in New York City and Philadelphia.
